The Army Secretary

The U.S. Army had made mistakes — some not serious and some almost fatal. But, the worst one it made concerned Private William Matson. He wasn't so good digging ditches. But as an army secretary, well, he was almost impossible. Put it this way: the army was so short of typists it was willing to even use the "two finger" variety. You know what I mean. The one who looks at the keyboard and hits keys with one finger of each hand.

Major John Simsons called Private Matson into his office and handed him a typewritten sheet.

"How long will it take you to make one copy of this?"

"This would take me ten minutes without a mistake on it," was the reply.

"Excellent," smiled the officer. "Now make me five copies."

The private then came up with this startling bit of mathematical calculations:

"It will be done, sir. But then I will need five other typists and it will take us 50 minutes."

The Major was doing his best to get his male secretary to understand he must knock on the door to the private office before coming into it.

"If I had the General in my office and you walked in, then it might be embarrassing."

"Never could make such a terrible mistake," said the private.

"How could you be so certain about it?" continued the officer.

"Because I always peep through the keyhole before I come in," was the unexpected reply.

The Captain

This one took place during those bleak, terrible days of World War II. The Nazi submarine wolf packs were sinking a great part of the convoys that crossed the Atlantic Ocean and also some of these World War I four - stacker coal burners we had "lend - leased" to Great Britain. When we entered the war, we were short of boats to protect the convoys. Somebody in the Navy Department remembered that a lot of World War I sub chasers had been sold as fishing boats. Were they still in existence? And in what shape?

Thus "Margarette II" became number 67 as a reconditioned sub chaser. The problem was to get skippers for them which was not a very pleasant assignment. The odds were 7 out of 10 you would never make it. John Whiley was fresh out of the Academy. Admiral Wilson sent for him.

"You are now Captain Whiley. You will take over number 67 at the end of the week for a trial run. Then, you will be given a convoy assignment."

He was so thrilled that as soon as he returned to his room, he wrote the following letter:

"Dear Mother — I made it! I jumped all the way up. I am now a Captain. I soon will be taking my own vessel across the Atlantic Ocean. My love to you, dad, and my girl, Selma."

He received the following quick reply: "God bless you, my son! To me, you are a captain. To your father, you are a captain. To Selma, you are a captain. But to a captain, are you a captain?"

P.S.: he made it!

The Plane Problem

The Marine flyer realized he was in trouble. He was losing altitude very quickly. He knew he would have to make an emergency landing. But where? He shuddered as he thought of what might happen if he ditched his plane and it hit an apartment house. He would stick with it to the end. Good fortune was with him. He made a perfect landing in an empty field. Then, he got out to see if he could find out what was wrong.

A spotted dog came up to him and sniffed the plane three times.

"It's your fuel line," said the dog. "Clogged up. Check on it right now."

The Marine flyer ignored the advice of the dog. He continued his inspection of the plane. The dog was persistent.

"You're like all the rest that have to land here in an emergency. I'm telling you what is wrong. Examine your fuel line. In five minutes, you can fix it and be up in the air again."

The man didn't lose his temper. He merely told the dog to beat it pronto.

"So, you won't listen to me," retorted the animal. "Serves you right if you have to remain here all night."

With these parting words, the dog turned around and ran away. A few minutes later, a boy appeared.

"Looking for my dog," said the youngster.

"Is he a spotted dog?" asked the Marine flyer.

"That's my dog," smiled the boy. "Have I get trouble with him."

"Thinks he is a first-rate airplane mechanic. Knows nothing about fixing planes at all."
